FYI

Endangered archaeological site topic of meeting:

Hundreds of years ago the Wabash River bank was home to a large prehistoric Native American village. Today Indiana University scientists, led by Cheryl Ann Munson, IU archaeologist and research scientist in the Department of Anthropology, are rescuing the last traces of Posey County's Bone Bank village before it is lost to erosion. Indiana's first state-funded rescue investigation at an endangered archaeological site will be the topic for Harmonie Associates' fall meeting at 7 p.m. on Friday, November 10, at Thrall's Opera House in New Harmony. Munson will give a slide lecture presentation about the rescue currently underway at the Bone Bank site. The meeting, co-sponsored by Historic New Harmony, is open to the public. Attendees may bring a dessert for a post-lecture buffet. Place settings and beverages will be provided. For more information call Harmonie Associates President, Martha Raske at 812/682-3389.
