ENGLISH ENERGY CRISIS

Mrs. Paul Grimes recently returned from a six-week trip to England where she drove nearly 1,000 miles visiting friends and relatives in the Gloucestershire and Nottingham areas.

The energy crisis is quite severe in England and the enforced speed limit is 50 mph. If you are caught exceeding this limit, you will be fined 50 pounds, which is approximately $110.00 -- with no option but to pay. Although gasoline is not rationed, the prohibitive cost ($1.00 per gallon) creates its own type of rationing.

The merchants also are conserving energy by not heating their stores and by using kerosene lamps and candles two days a week for lighting purposes. Such poor lighting resulted in Mrs. Grimes using her good old American ingenuity and shopping by flashlight.

Designed room temperatures are normally 65° but the inflationary cost of fuel has forced some homes to drop their temperature into the fifties. And while we "sanctimoniously" turn our thermostats back to 68° or even 65° at night, the English turn their heat OFF! (by Judy Rogers)
